A year and quarter plan that fits the month you actually have

Student Wyckoff · My Day · 2026-10-25

Start with the commitments already known

Begin with dates you already know: a school term, a project deadline, family travel or a seasonal workload. Then choose a few results that would make the year meaningfully different. Write assumptions separately, such as having three evenings available for study. That time is not genuinely free until you compare it with work and ordinary responsibilities. You may start an annual plan on any date. Starting late calls for a smaller scope, rather than trying to compress a whole year into its remaining weeks.
